The Philippines government knows that smoking is deadly. However, it also knows that more than 60 000 farmers rely on tobacco crops for a living. The solution? "We are trying to find other uses for tobacco," says Perlita Baula of the (21)

National Tobacco Administration.

Traditional healers in the Philippines use tobacco leaves to treat wounds and insect bites, so researchers want to assess the plant's potential as a topical painkiller (22) and antibacterial medicine. The plant also has a high protein content, which can be removed and added to food supplements. The most promising by-products are (23) paper and particle board.

"We are doing this to add on to the farmers' income," notes Baula. "I don't (24) think we will ever eliminate smoking through this programme."

Ron held us at gunpoint for several hours. When we finally escaped, the baby and I had been badly beaten. The police formed a manhunt to search the nearby woods. I watched as my once tender and loving husband was shackled like a wild beast and shoved roughly into a patrol car to spend the next months huddled in a dark corner of a tiny prison cell.

Our neighbours treated us as if we had leprosy. Parents would not allow their children to play with mine. At the primary school where I worked, my ability to teach was suddenly under scrutiny. Life became a long, dark tunnel.

I begged for a hearing with a prominent judge. I testified as to Ron's state of mind before he went to war and how he gradually degenerated to his present condition. However, the judge's verdict was nearly void of hope.

Some years after Ron's incarceration, two sickly baby ravens arrived at my door. I took them in after much deliberation as I seemed to be their only chance of survival. Months on, the smaller raven failed to live but 'Charlie' survived. Little did I know what changes the tiny orphan was about to bring to my life.

It was Charlie who began removing barriers the neighbours had erected against us. Children could not resist him and loved digging worms for him.

Next to eating worms, Charlie's favourite thing to do was to snuggle. Our dog, Zeke, loved orphans; he had already successfully raised a litter of abandoned kittens and twelve ducklings, encircling them with his paws when he napped.

Since Zeke had no orphans at the time, he filled Charlie's need for snuggling, and Charlie filled Zeke's need to be needed. It was comical to watch the chick endure the bath Zeke insisted on delivering before he would snuggle. Charlie would close his eyes and sit as still as he could in spite of being raised off the ground at every swipe of Zeke's tongue.

Charlie slowly nestled into my heart - like good seed in fertile soil. It was Charlie to whom I unburdened as I realised that Ron would never come home. Night after night, when the children were in bed, I shared my sorrow with Charlie as he nestled in my arms.

I wept for my own rejection, for my children's own poverty of both funds and father; I wept for the loss of my husband. However, somehow, after a good cry with Charlie, life did not look so forbidding.

After Charlie learnt to talk, he would use my voice to call Zeke to the back porch. Zeke would come around the comer of the house only to discover his bowl empty, again. Charlie would fly to the top of a tree and laugh his loud belly laugh.

When Charlie was about a year old, I accepted a teaching position out of town. Charlie adapted well. There, the local children attributed magical powers to him: He was free to go wherever he wanted, yet he chose to live with humans! He definitely held many of us under his spell — including a veterinarian we took him to when we found Charlie's leg dangling at an odd angle in the lawn one day. The vet refused payment when he managed to cure Charlie as he felt that Charlie was the most remarkable animal he had ever treated.

In a century of explosive innovation and elaborate gadgetry, Momofuku Ando made his fortune from a more humble discovery. This Japanese instant-noodle inventor's skilful (51) of flour, oil and a little salt and MSG (52)
undoubtedly redefined the way the world eats.
Ando's original Chicken Ramen, after months of (53) and error, has spawned multiple variations. In India, masala is the (54) choice.

Two brothers, who have run away from home to escape their abusive father, are on their own on the streets of an Indian city. With the help of other street children, the brothers learn to work as glass collectors and things begin to look brighter.

It was such a relief when we finally moved to the island especially when no one challenged us. For what seemed like hours we had watched other street dwellers – men, women and children – settling down for the night on bamboo mats wrapped in ragged blankets under makeshift canopies. We had waited while the traffic died down until-all that passed by was the occasional taxi or rickshaw. Then we ran quickly across the road, stepped over the little wire fence and stood looking around.

"This is cool," I grinned at Sandeep. "We've got our own island."

"What if someone wants to take it from us?" Sandeep asked.

"We'll tell them we were here first," Suresh replied.

Sandeep went quiet and I thought he had gone to sleep. I sat gazing into the night for a while longer. My mind was too full to close it down. I felt as though someone had plucked me from a warm and cosy nest and dropped me into a totally alien landscape although I knew deep down that the nest had been far from warm and cosy for quite a long time. I had to build a new nest on my own and I wanted to make it feel like the safest place on earth. Our island was just a beginning. I lay down at last and allowed the waves of exhaustion to envelope me.

We must have fallen asleep because the next thing I knew, I was startled by the blast of a horn very close to my head. I sat up quickly but it took a few moments for me to work out where I was. It was getting bright. I could see a bus disappearing down the road to the left of the island. A truck went by too, circling round us before heading off to the right. I stood up and stretched, working my neck from side to side to loosen it up. As I did so, I saw that I was being watched. A boy was leaning against a lamp post on the opposite side and staring at me. I turned away from him and pretended to be busy with the belongings in my bag. I began to feel uneasy. He strolled across the road and stopped outside the wire fence.

"You've got yourself a good place there," he said.

I nodded. Sandeep began to stir.

"I wish I'd thought of it myself," the boy continued.
